The Brand Deal Pipeline

Six steps from invisible to invoiced. Price it, prove it, pitch it, get paid.

Brand deals are the fastest money in the Creator Economy, and the most unevenly distributed. The Creators getting paid aren't lucky. They run a pipeline: they know their rate, they look professional when a brand checks them out, they pitch with research, and they follow up like it's a job, because it is. The good news: every piece of that is learnable, and most of it is free.

These six steps build that pipeline. Four of the six tools are free to start, and the whole system takes about fifteen minutes a week to run once it's up. Even if you only do steps 1 and 2, you'll walk into your next negotiation better armed than most of the market.

I've negotiated these rates directly. CAN members get the best deal, but most partners have also provided a discount you can claim for free just for signing up for this guide.

1 Price yourself from data, not vibes.

Brands decide what you're worth before you ever speak. Your job is to know the number first. FYPM (F You Pay Me) is rate intelligence crowdsourced from thousands of Creators: what people your size, in your niche, actually got paid, plus the brand contacts who paid them.

It also shows you what a brand has paid other Creators before you ever get on the call. Negotiating with receipts beats negotiating with hope. Check your number again every six months; rates move faster than you think.

Rule one of the pipeline: never open with a number lower than what the data says your peers are getting.

2 Pass the brand-safety screen.

Before a brand answers your pitch, someone runs a safety check on you: fake-follower ratios, NSFW flags, potential controversy. CreatorScore shows you exactly what they see, and what to fix, before it quietly costs you a partnership.

Run the report, fix what's fixable, then pitch. Do it before a pitch run, not after a rejection: brands rarely tell you this is why they passed. They just go quiet.

More brand safe, more brand dollars. The report is the cheapest raise you'll get this year.

3 Build the profile brands check.

Half of closing a brand deal is looking closeable. The Creator's Guild of America's Mosaic is the IMDb Pro of the Creator Economy: a validated record of your work that reads as professional to brands, platforms, and future partners. I'm a member, and I sit on their Advisory Board.

Claim your Creator ID, load your best work, and put the Mosaic link in your pitch signature. It answers the "is this person legit" question before anyone asks it. Brands do this diligence silently; the profile is for the check that never emails you.

4 Research and pitch with AI leverage.

Volume cold-DMing is dead. Creatorland MCP Pro connects your AI assistant to Creatorland's Creator Economy data, so it can research brands, benchmark rates, build targeted lists, and draft outreach that reads like you did an hour of homework, because it did.

Start each week by listing ten brands already sponsoring Creators your size in your lane. They've proven they pay for what you do; you're just next in line.

A realistic cadence: twenty researched pitches a week beats two hundred sprayed ones.

5 Run it like a pipeline.

Brand deals die in messy inboxes. Dealsync tracks your active partnerships, surfaces new ones, and keeps past sponsors warm. The easiest sponsorship you'll ever close is the brand that already paid you once.

The ritual: fifteen minutes a week, and every open conversation gets a next step or gets closed. Track three columns: waiting on them, waiting on you, and closed. Anything sitting in "waiting on you" for more than a day is the leak.

That alone puts you ahead of most of the market.

6 Get the money, keep the money.

Before you deliver anything: scope, usage rights, payment terms, and a kill fee, in writing. The kill fee means if they cancel after you've made the thing, you still get paid something; put a number on it up front. Invoice the day you deliver, not the week after. Usage rights are the other quiet money: a 30-day ad license and a perpetual one are not the same price, so charge for the difference.

And when a brand goes quiet on an invoice, you don't have to eat it. DUPAY runs collections for Creators and has already recovered over $1 million in unpaid sponsor income. Set it up while things are friendly.
