The Creator Newsletter Launch Plan

Seven steps. Seven days. From blank page to your first send, with the exact stack we use ourselves.

A newsletter is the only audience you actually own: no algorithm between you and the reader, and sponsors pay real money for that direct line. Every serious Creator business ends up with one under it, including ours.

Most people stall for months picking tools and polishing a design nobody has subscribed to yet. None of that matters in week one. This plan gets you from blank page to first send in seven days.

I've negotiated these rates directly. CAN members get the best deal, but most partners have also provided a discount you can claim for free just for signing up for this guide.

THE PLAN

- 1 Pick your premise. No tools, just the promise.
- 2 Set up the machine. beehiiv.
- 3 Write it in half the time. Wispr Flow.
- 4 Get your first 100 readers. Growth in Reverse.
- 5 Monetize when it's real. FYPM.
- 6 Run it like a business. Mercury.
- 7 Follow the seven-day calendar.

1 Pick your premise.

A newsletter is a promise you repeat every week. Before you touch any software, write it down: "I help [one specific kind of person] [get one specific outcome], every [cadence]." If your reader is "everyone interested in my niche," it's nobody. The test: can you name ten real people who'd forward it?

Two premises that pass: "I help solo YouTubers land their first paid sponsorship, every Tuesday." "I help food Creators turn recipes into digital products, twice a month." Specific person, specific outcome, named day.

Three premise shapes that work, if you're stuck:

- The curator. "I find the best [X] every week so you don't have to."
- The practitioner. "I'm building [X] in public. Learn from my numbers and my mistakes."
- The translator. "I make [complicated thing] make sense for [specific audience]."

Write yours down and tape it where you draft. Every issue either serves the premise or gets cut.

2 Set up the machine.

Use beehiiv. I'm not guessing: Creator Access Network's own newsletter runs on it, and it's the strongest platform anywhere for writing, growing, and monetizing a newsletter as a business. On day one you need exactly four things: a publication, a welcome email, one signup page, and your first subscriber (you).

Day one, in order: create the publication, write a two-line welcome email (what they'll get, and when), turn on the default signup page, then subscribe yourself and send a test.

Skip the design rabbit hole in week one. A clean default template with a sharp premise beats a beautiful template with a vague one, every time.

NEWSLETTER

MONETIZATION

If you've thought about starting a newsletter, you've heard of beehiiv. One of the most powerful feature sets anywhere for running a newsletter as a business. Ours runs on it.

New beehiiv subscribers only.

MEMBER RATE 25% off paid plans and upgrades for a full year, up to $1,212

3 Write it in half the time.

The discipline that keeps a newsletter alive is a word limit. Aim for about 600 words an issue: long enough to deliver the promise, short enough to ship weekly without dread.

And draft by talking, not typing. Say the issue out loud like you're explaining it to one reader, let Wispr Flow turn your voice into clean text in any app, then edit on screen. The spoken draft is faster, and it sounds like you, which is the thing readers subscribe to.

A 600-word issue that works: one hook (two sentences), one core idea (300 words), one example (200 words), one action for the reader (50 words), sign-off. Fill the template instead of reinventing it. Then write five subject lines, keep the sharpest, and name the outcome, not the topic.

4 Get your first 100 readers.

Your first 100 readers come from places you already control:

- Bio links everywhere. Every profile you own points at the signup page, today.
- Announce three times, not once. One announcement reaches a third of your audience. Post the premise, then a preview, then the first issue.
- Repurpose every issue. Each 600-word issue contains two or three native posts for your main channel. The issue is the source material, not a secret.
- Ask twenty people for one forward each. A personal ask converts better than any ad you'll ever run.

And steal from the newsletters that already did it: read three Growth in Reverse teardowns in your lane and borrow the first growth moves that fit.

5 Monetize when it's real.

Don't sell to an empty room. Wait until you have roughly 500 to 1,000 engaged readers before pitching sponsors; beehiiv's own monetization tools (paid tiers, boosts, its ad network) switch on whenever you're ready.

When you do pitch, price from data, not guesswork. FYPM is rate intelligence crowdsourced from thousands of Creators: what newsletters your size actually charge, and which brands are paying. Your first rate card shouldn't be a shot in the dark.

Your first sponsor is usually already a reader. When the numbers are there, mention you're opening one slot per issue; scarcity is honest when there's only one of you.

6 Run it like a business.

The moment money moves, separate it from your personal accounts. Mercury gives you real business banking with no monthly fees, opened online in minutes.

The order that works: open the account, point every payout at it (beehiiv, Stripe, brand invoices), then pay yourself monthly by transfer.

The rest of the boring-but-important setup (LLC, taxes, insurance) is its own project, and we already wrote that guide. The free Creator Business Setup Checklist walks it in four steps: get it here.

7 Follow the calendar.

Everything above compresses into one week. Print this page, or don't, but ship on Day 6.

- Day 1 Write the premise sentence. Read three Growth in Reverse teardowns in your lane.
- Day 2 Set up beehiiv: publication, welcome email, signup page. Apply code CAN20.
- Day 3 Talk-draft issue #1 with Wispr Flow. Don't edit while drafting.
- Day 4 Edit to ~600 words. Write five subject lines, keep the best. Send a test to five friends.
- Day 5 Bio links everywhere. Post the premise announcement.
- Day 6 Send issue #1 to everyone who signed up. Yes, even if that's nine people.
- Day 7 Repurpose issue #1 into two native posts. Outline issue #2. You now run a newsletter.

After the first send. Week two is the same loop, smaller: draft Monday, ship Thursday, repurpose Friday.

- Keep the word limit. Scope creep kills more newsletters than a lack of ideas ever will.
- Double down on whatever brought readers. Check your signup sources weekly and do more of the top one.
- Watch replies, not opens. Replies tell you what to write next; opens just tell you the subject line worked.
- Upgrade tools only when they're the bottleneck. Your rates above don't expire with week one.

YOUR STACK AT A GLANCE

	FREE RATE	MEMBER RATE
Growth in Reverse	Free weekly teardowns	$50 off the Growth Vault
beehiiv	20% off your first 3 months	25% off for a full year, up to $1,212
